The Casino and Gaming Device sector has been hurt by the broader slowdown in the gambling industry. As America's economy slid into a recession, people began spending less money on recreation. Consequently, the gambling industry saw a decline in customer frequency and per-visit spending. With revenues at 2004 levels, many casinos have been hesitating to replace old slot-machine equipment. Companies within the Casino and Gaming Devices sector such as International Game Technology producing these systems have been struggling as a result. This decline in capital expenditure by casinos is anticipated to only hurt the near-term value of the Casino and Gaming Device sector as casinos will have to upgrade their machines eventually to maintain traffic levels. It is expected that when one casino finally gives in and makes a large scale upgrade it will set off a chain reaction throughout the industry and slot machine sales should recover. Until then, the biggest area of growth for the Casino and Gaming Device's sector is Canada where growth in sales is expected between 85,000 and 125,000 machines.
