MANISTEE, MI – One of Michigan’s popular casinos has been named a possible coronavirus exposure site by health officials.

Anyone who visited Little River Casino Resort in Manistee between Oct. 2-4 is asked to self-monitor for COVID-19 symptoms for 14 days from the possible exposure date, according to a news release issued by the District Health Department No. 10, which covers 10 Northern Michigan counties including Manistee.

The announcement comes after a visitor of the casino tested positive for COVID-19 and was potentially contagious while visiting Little River, health officials said. The individual visited the casino over the three day period of Oct. 2-4.

Health officials ask those who are self-monitoring for symptoms to stay away from family, close contacts and roommates as much as possible. Anyone who begins to experience COVID-19 symptoms – which includes fever or chills, cough, fatigue, shortness of breath – should quarantine and contact local health officials.

Per state orders, Little River requires guests to wear face coverings in all situations except while dining in one of the restaurants, eating or drinking a beverage on the gaming floor, while in a hotel room or to smoke in designated smoking areas.

The casino began implementing stricter policies for face coverings Sept. 7. Bandannas, neck gaiters and masks with valves no longer qualify as acceptable face coverings on the property.
